

CLIENT VALUE INTERVIEW

GOH CONSULTING

Goal: Give you our exact process for creating a powerful sales asset that will move viewers to a buying state without being sold to. Perfect for turning cold prospects into ready to buy state fast.

What this is

A sit-down conversation where you walk a client back through their actual journey in the program, start to finish. The journey is mapped on a visual miro board you present together on camera, and every lesson is designed to teach the viewer a lesson and prove the transformation with real evidence.

Examples:

- Emma Value Interview
- Wyatt Value Interview

In short, this is a client interview disguised as a value video to get more views and attention

The whole format rests on one rule: give the viewer the direction, not the how.

You tell them where to go. You show enough of the how to prove you know what you are doing. But you hold the full how inside the program. That gap is what makes the video both valuable and magnetic.

if i had to build a $100k/mo personal brand from scratch, this is what i'd do

SooWei Goh Biz and SooWei Goh

7.1k views • 1 month ago

2 VPH

4.5x

Why it matters

Most client interviews are selfish. They are built around the idea of why someone should work with you, and that only lands with a bottom-of-funnel viewer who is ready to buy. Everyone earlier in the buyer's journey tunes out, because the video gives them nothing they can use.

from $30k to $102k/mo with his consulting biz in 60 days... here's how

633 views • 4 months ago

Client interviews always tank in views, feels salesy, and not suitable for a main channel video

The Client Value Interview flips that. Because every decision you go through teaches a real lesson, it pulls the top and middle of funnel viewers (the people who do not yet know they need you). They get value, they trust you more, and they leave curious about the part you did not show them.

- Direction without the how is what makes this video effective. It creates the pull instead of pushing the sale.

Example: Wyatt's video teaches the viewer that going broad beats going niche, that you build the brand before you lead with value, and that content compounds. A viewer can act on all of that today without buying anything. But the exact system stays inside the program, so the viewer who wants the how has only one place to get it.

When to use this

Use this when you want to reach the viewer who already senses you are good at what you do but does not yet understand exactly how you would help them. That viewer is warm but not sold. They do not need more proof that you exist. They need to see the path, mapped on someone like them, so they can picture themselves on it.

- When not to use it. Do not use this format to close a bottom-of-funnel audience that is already deciding, they want specifics and offer detail, not a journey story

Before you start

Confirm all of the following are in place before you book a filming date:

- A featured client who meets all four selection criteria and has agreed to appear.
- Their real journey mapped out: the key sessions, the turning points, the actions they took, and the numbers.
- A built journey board. Do not film without it.
 - Wyatt Example
- The real proof for every claim you plan to make: screenshots, stats, earnings, view counts, etc
- The client briefed and pre-framed.
- A filming setup

Step by Step Process

Goal of this section: produce an interview where every lesson teaches a direction and proves the transformation, while still feeling like a genuine conversation

Step 1: Choose the right client to feature

The client makes or breaks the video. Choose someone who meets all four of these

1. They achieved a transformation your audience actively wants. The end state has to be a result your ideal viewer dreams about.

2. They started where your audience starts. This is the one people underrate. The viewer buys in because the client began exactly where they are now. Relatability is the hook.
3. The change was drastic and clearly came from the program. A vague or modest shift does not carry a long-form video.
4. They can hold a natural, detailed conversation on camera. If they freeze or give one-line answers, it turns into a boring video and loses the viewer

Pick the starting line as carefully as the finish. The result is what they want. The starting point is why they believe it is possible for them.

- Example: Wyatt started with no team, working 12 hours per day, content not landing, which is exactly where a struggling coach sits. He went to three straight six-figure months. Relatable start, dream finish, and he could talk.

Step 2: Brief the team and build the journey board

The journey board is the visual you present on camera and the loose script for the conversation. It does both jobs at once.

You/ your CSM gives the Production Team the context: the transformation, the sessions the client went through, the moments things changed, and the results. They build the board as a left-to-right timeline of the client's real journey.

- You can easily use Claude to scrape all the data from the Fathom call, ask the client what they feel like were the three biggest changes, and build the board around that

The board is different for every client. There is no fixed template. What stays constant is the logic: you are mapping the client's real journey as a teaching timeline. Build it from these card types:

- Transformation header: A simple chart of the numbers over time, so the payoff is visible from the first second. For Wyatt: $7k in January, then $105k, then $95k, then $112.5k projected.

- Starting state: The pain that the viewer is facing as well. For Wyatt: no team, cannot leverage content, $7k a month, no momentum, drowning.

- Intervention chains: This is the heart of the board. For each turning point, lay out a short chain: Session (the call or touchpoint), to Insight (the direction given), to Action (what the client did), to Result (what happened), with a piece of proof attached.

- Proof: A real screenshot hung on the relevant beat: a post, an earnings figure, a view count, follower and ideal-client-follower stats, a reposted story.

- Closing state: Where they are now, and their vision for what comes next.

Map the journey as a chain of Session, Insight, Action, Result, Proof. That structure is what lets the viewer follow the path and believe it at the same time.

The intervention chain (heart of the board)

We map this on Miro, a visual whiteboard, because it presents cleanly on screen and lets you walk the timeline left to right

Step 3: Gather the proof for every claim

Goal: make every claim in the video undeniable.

For each lesson you plan to hit, pull the real evidence: screenshots of the client's posts, their earnings dashboard, view counts, follower and ideal-client-follower numbers, individual video performance, direct messages, reposts.

Get these from the client directly and from your own records and past call recordings. The Editor lays each one on screen at the matching moment, so the viewer sees the proof exactly as the client describes it. A claim with a screenshot behind it lands. A claim without one feels hollow.

Step 4: Prep and pre-frame the client

A great client still needs preparing. Do this before the filming day.

1. Send them the journey and the board in advance. They should know the lessons and what they will be asked to talk about. It is what lets the conversation flow instead of stalling.
2. Ask them to prepare two or three analogies or frameworks they can share on camera. These prepared lines are often the most quotable, most shareable moments in the whole video, and they make it feel like a discussion between two people who know their craft.
3. Pre-frame the depth. Tell them that flat, one-line answers kill the video. An answer like “I broadened my content” teaches the viewer nothing. They need to go into the why, the feeling, and the specifics. Set this expectation before you roll, not during.

Prepping the client is not scripting them. It is giving them the runway to be detailed and natural.

Step 5: Run the interview, free flow over structure

You present the board with the client, in person, on camera, and walk the timeline together.

Follow the structure below loosely. It is a spine so you never get lost, not a script to read. The number one rule is free flow. A real conversation that wanders and digs will always beat a rigid checklist.

The loose spine:

1. Open on the transformation. Lead with the result.
2. How does it feel now
3. Take it back. How did we meet
4. What problems were you facing
5. Why couldn't you solve them on your own.
6. How frustrating did that feel
7. What got you to join, and why.
8. First impression when you joined.
9. Results in the first three weeks, and how that felt.
10. What was the first thing you actually did.
11. The biggest problem we solved together.
12. What was different about this compared to everything else you tried.
13. If you hadn't joined, where would you be now.
14. Your vision for the next year.
15. What would you say to someone stuck in that same spot.
16. To anyone thinking about joining, what would you say.

From questions 12 - 16, you DON'T need the journey board. Free flow and go into a full on conversation with the client. This is where you get the real meat and potatoes that gets him to speak about his experience about the program (the real client interview)

Your real job during the interview is to pull the teachable direction out of each answer.

When the client says something flat, dig deeper

- Ask why it worked, what changed in how they think, what they would tell someone facing the same thing.
- Turn a flat line like "I broadened my content" into the full lesson the viewer can act on: target who you actually want to attract, not just your ideal client on paper.

And as each lesson surfaces, apply the core rule live. Give the direction. Show a little of the how to prove competence

What good looks like

You have done this right when:

- A viewer who never buys still leaves with real, usable direction.
- The featured client started where your audience starts, and the transformation is undeniable because the proof is on screen.
- It feels like a genuine conversation, not an advertisement and not a testimonial.
- Every major lesson teaches a direction, and the full how is mostly withheld, leaving the viewer curious.
- The target viewer, the one who knew you were good but not how you could help, finishes in a buying state without ever feeling sold to.

Common mistakes

Making it about you.

- This has everything to do with the client that achieved the transformation, make them feel like they are the hero and you are the guide that helped them achieve their goals

Giving away the full how.

- Hand over the entire system and you kill both the curiosity and the reason to buy. You also lose the positioning. Show enough to prove competence

Featuring the wrong client.

- A starting point your audience cannot relate to, or a result they do not actually want, breaks the video before it starts. So does a client who cannot hold a conversation.

Accepting flat answers.

- A one-line answer with no detail is a dead beat. Pre-frame for depth and dig in the moment and know exactly how to get the best answers out of your client

Scripting it word for word.

- A read-out script kills the free flow that makes this feel real. The structure is a spine, not a teleprompter.

Skipping the proof.

- Claims without screenshots feel like talk. The evidence is what makes it undeniable.

Edge cases and exceptions

Great result, but the client is not articulate. Coach them harder in the pre-frame, or choose a different client. Do not force it. A quiet feature is a weak video.

The numbers are not dramatic, but the lesson is strong. Lead with the relatability and the lesson rather than the chart. A transformation can be qualitative, a mindset or a way of working, not only revenue.

Sensitive numbers the client will not share publicly. Agree what is shareable before you film. Use ranges, or lean on other proof, rather than putting them on the spot on camera.

You do not have records of their early journey. Reconstruct it with the client during the brief. Their memory plus whatever proof exists is enough to map the timeline.

Things to note

Relatability is the hook, not the result. The viewer commits because the client started exactly where they are. Choose the starting line with as much care as the finish.

The board does double duty. It is the visual that makes the journey easy to follow on screen, and it is the loose script that keeps the conversation on track without feeling scripted. Build it well and the interview almost runs itself.

Free flow is a skill. The structure exists so you are never lost, but the value is in following the energy of the conversation and digging exactly where it gets interesting. The best moments are never on the list.

The prepared analogies travel. The two or three lines the client brings are often the clips that get shared. Wyatt comparing learning from afar to reading a manual on how to fix a car versus living with a mechanic is the kind of line that keeps working for you long after the video is posted.

Quick checklist

Run this before you film. Every answer should be yes.

- ☐ Does the featured client start where your audience starts?
- ☐ Is the transformation something your audience actively wants?
- ☐ Can this client hold a natural, detailed conversation on camera?
- ☐ Is the journey board built, with a Session, Insight, Action, Result, Proof chain for each beat?
- ☐ Is the real proof gathered for every claim you will make?
- ☐ Has the client seen the journey and the board, and prepared two or three analogies?
- ☐ Have you pre-framed them to go deep, with no flat answers?
- ☐ For every lesson, are you giving direction and withholding the full how?

- ☐ Would a viewer who never buys still get real value from this?
- ☐ Does the whole thing feel like a conversation, not a testimonial or an ad?